The MP Briefing:

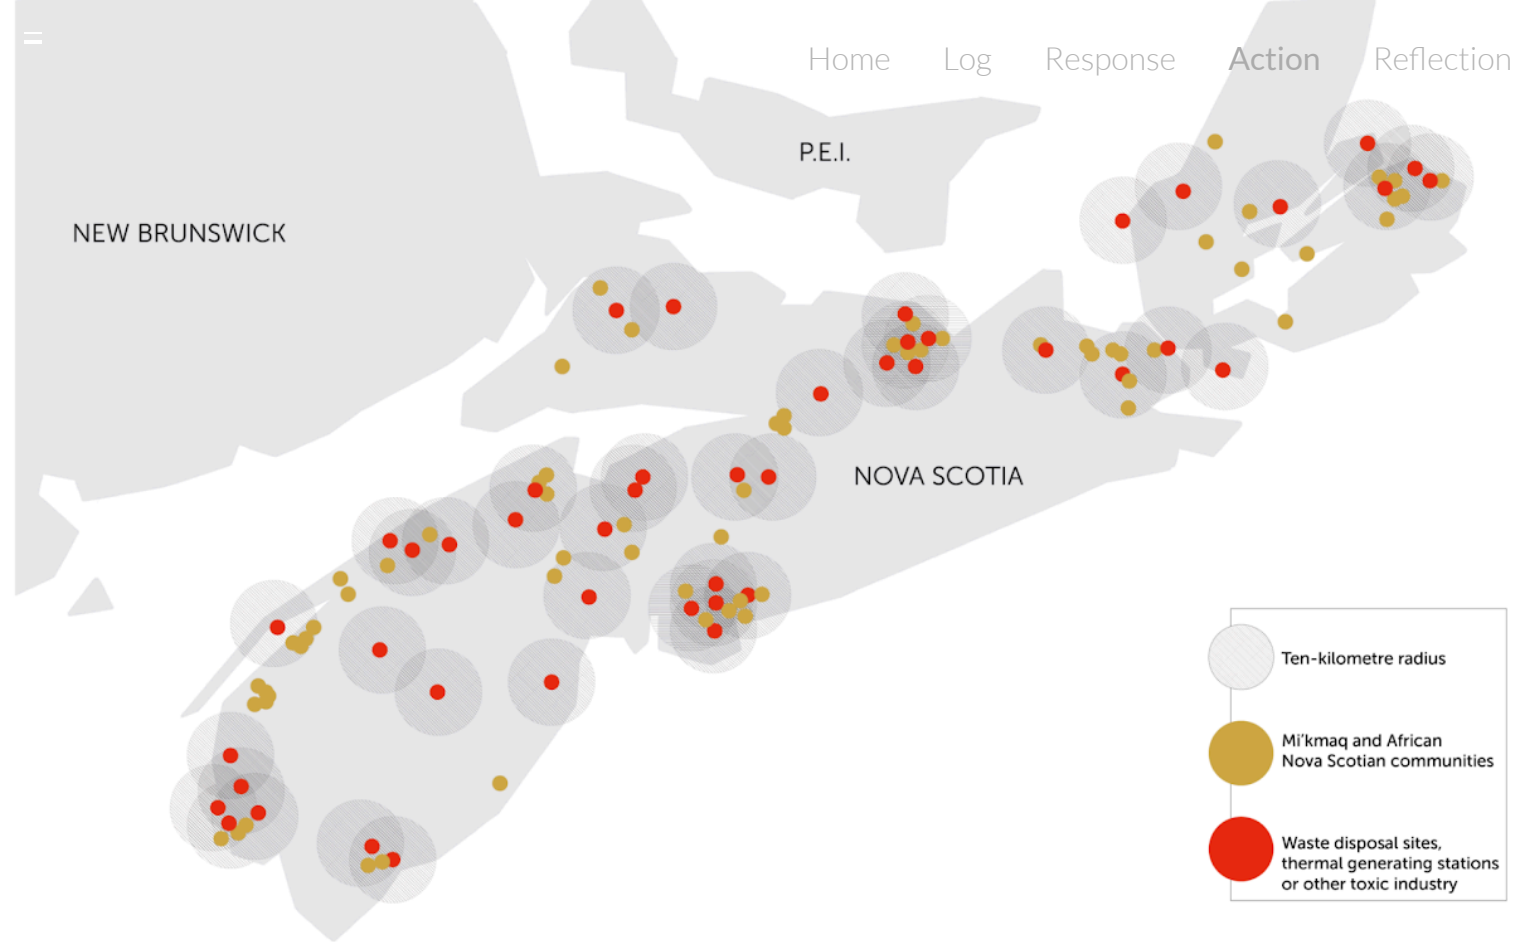

Dear Juile Dabrusin,

We need your help; there have been problems regarding the community's drinking water systems within indigenous areas. These problems are how different indigenous communities have not been given clean water, which they have long called for. They would like to have clean, safe, sustainable drinking water.

There have been many scenarios where some indigenous people have needed to leave their land due to unsafe drinking water, which also caused them illness, such as skin illnesses and even caused vomiting and headaches. This impacts the indigenous communities in health conditions, mental health impacts, contaminations which are cancer-causing, the daily hardship of having to keep boiling water, financial burden, cultural rights, conflicts for clean water, and many more. Their waterways and lands are polluted by effluence, which also causes unsafe water. When indigenous people speak about this topic, they are left with broken promises. The Canadian government knows this is happening, but doesn't seem to do anything about it. The government only provides a certain amount of funds to Indigenous reserves for the issue of clean water, but these funds aren't enough. This won't last in the long run.

We need you to use and apply your skills to help "Water quantity, freshwater quality, cleaning up our lakes and rivers, water science, sustainability indicators, marine water quality, protecting water," with the Indigenous people. We should also push for community-led water governance for the indigenous people. This gives indigenous people more control over their water because the other water sources, such as Halifax water, aren't helping them. If you give them control, then they'll be able to assert indigenous jurisdiction over traditional land and resources. Water is also deeply connected to their cultural identity. Doing this will also give the Indigenous people jobs. So instead of asking the government for money, they will have sovereignty over their own resources because they can provide money for their communities. So, indigenous people just want clean water, and this has been going on for decades. Everyone deserves clean water, and it's up to you to help them get it.

Sincerely, Jessa.
