The first nations clean water act

(Bill C-61)

This new project aims to affirm First Nations' inherited right to self-government over water services and establish federal standards that are co-developed with indigenous partners. The First Nations Water and Wastewater Enhancement Program is currently active, with over 650 completed projects or ongoing nationwide to upgrade infrastructure on reserves. In Nova Scotia, there are collaborative working groups between indigenous services Canada and Mi'kmaw communities to identify and address specific regional infrastructure gaps. While all 13 First Nations in Nova Scotia have zero long-term drinking water advisories, approximately 34% of waste water systems nationwide still fail to meet effluent regulations, indicating a persistent gap in long-term infrastructure sustainability.

These projects are still developing because the Indigenous peoples were promised for a very long time that they would have clean water. After they spoke up and started getting involved things started to change. The process is slow and it's still going. Project Bill C-61 has made a difference their empty promises are still affecting first Nations and Indigenous peoples.
